

ties are needed to maintain the confidence of employees in the plan and the conviction among the supervisory forces that it is a genuine aid to efficient management. Supplementing all these there is a further need for surveying results. It is to this problem that we direct attention in the next chapter.